

After a fashion

A two-day fashion design workshop was held at Maclean High School last Thursday and Friday. Whitehouse Institute of Design, which has campuses in Sydney and Melbourne, conducted the workshop to give students a taste of what it would be like working in the world of fashion.

"Students analysed the female body and drew a geometric body to create a fashion template," Whitehouse Institute's Natalie

Kambos said. "Today the students are designing their own fashion range."

Ms Kambos said students could study for a Bachelor of Design at the institute after completing year 12. "We also offer six-week Vocation Education and Training-based courses that are conducted during holiday periods throughout the year."

Students from Maclean, Grafton and South Grafton high schools attended the workshop.

Maclean students Jessica King (right) and Liarna O'Brien (left) learn some of the finer points of fashion design from tutor Natalie Kambos. Pic: Geoff Helisma